Having too many folders is bad for productivity because it creates unnecessary thinking work. Most people do not trust their Outlook or other computer program to help them retrieve messages and therefore set up lots of folders, each with very specific themes, to try to ensure they trust their folders.
Productivity consultants must embody the skills that they hope to teach others. Become organized in your personal life by de-cluttering and simplifying the systems and tasks that you use every day. File paperwork and receipts quickly, never leave things laying around, and organize your workspace and home to be as clean and neat as possible.
Attention to all levels. Attention should be given to all levels of a business. Productivity interventions can be targeted at multiple levels – from supporting changes at the top of an organisation to employee-centred interventions which enable individuals to be their most productive self. Get to grips with measurement.

Research shows that there is a significant gap between how leaders and employees view productivity within their companies. New research from Citrix, a software provider that offers digital workspace technology, shows a disparity between the perceived productivity levels of employees and employers at organisations.
The main productivity = profit measurement is the "team effectiveness ratio", which measures how much gross profit the company earns for every dollar spent on salary. This can be better than measuring profit against time as the goal is to get your team to work smarter, not longer. Strategy 6: The "Getting Shit Done" Strategy

To compare the productivity numbers against a benchmark, you can compare the current productivity with the standard amount of effort needed for the same output. Divide the standard labor hours by the actual amount of time worked and multiply by 100. The closer the final number is to 100, the more effective your employees are.
